The day after she married Mr. Ezra Boone, Clara was excited to discover a small piano disguised as a writing desk in the parlor of her new home, but her joy was short-lived...

Ezra's eyes blazed. "You must never play music in this house again!"

Clara Thomas is in a situation she couldn't have imagined a few short years ago. She is a widow now, and her husband Charles had left her no savings and no way to support herself except for teaching piano lessons to the children of those in Providence that could still afford them.

To make matters worse, she has no choice but to sell the one possession she values more than anything to pay her debts...the piano she inherited from her mother.

While reading the newspaper she sees an advertisement. It was placed by a widower interested in corresponding with a woman of upstanding character...with the possibility of marriage.

And now a few months later and only a day after becoming Mrs. Clara Boone, she discovers that there is so much more they need to learn about each other.

Will Clara ever discover why Ezra cannot hear her play the piano? Are her feelings of regret at marrying Ezra real? Will Ezra regain Clara's trust after his anger at hearing her playing? Will they both discover a way to make their new marriage work?

And will Ezra find a way to let Clara's love for him, and for music, back into his heart?
